(Mar. 29, 2022) — Well..., he’s done it again. While in Poland at a gathering of NATO allies, the Goofball-at-1600 once again proved that not only is he an incompetent clown unfit for the office he occupies, he is increasingly a danger not only to our Republic, but a danger to the rest of the world as well.

Specifically, in addressing the NATO members and, incidentally, the entire globe with access to the Internet, he went off-script – yes, Virginia..., shocking, but true – and said in reference to Russian President Vladimir Putin: “For God’s sake, this man cannot remain in power.” His words triggered a firestorm of comment, none of it good.

Worse yet, he has subsequently doubled down on those remarks, denying any intent to “walk them back” or moderate their meaning. Translation: the Goof says Putin must go.

Memo to P&E readers: make no mistake; Vladimir Putin is a war criminal. His military forces have committed war crimes in Ukraine not seen since the days of Hitler’s Nazi Germany, Pol Pot’s Cambodia and Assad’s Syria. When buildings unmistakably disclosing that there are innocent children inside are intentionally targeted and destroyed, killing hundreds of innocent babies, kids, mothers and fathers, you know that Putin has earned a very special place in the netherworld. His actions are indefensible and he must be held accountable, one way or another, and sooner rather than later.

On the other hand, Memo #1 to the Goof: in the middle of a hot war with the criminal invasion of Ukraine by Russia, now headed by a wounded, cornered beast armed with nuclear weapons – which he has ordered to be placed on high alert – it might not be the wisest or most prudent act to publicly advocate for regime change and his removal from power.

Private discussions, fine: public, not so much. Such a public call for action could further enrage the beast and trigger... Armageddon. If abject humiliation on the world stage and defeat on the battlefield are the only realistic outcomes, what does Putin have to lose?

The feckless and, candidly, stupid efforts of the Goof's handlers to "walk back" his words only makes matters worse. Obama Secretary of Defense Leon Panetta offered up the lunatic excuse that the clown made the incendiary comments "because he's Irish." Seriously? How's that for praising the Irish?

Granted, Putin personifies evil: anyone who directs his army to target and slaughter defenseless civilians should not only be removed from power, he should be tried for war crimes and, "if" convicted, suffer the same fates as the Nazis following the Nuremberg Trials. But calling for internal regime change in Russia in the middle of the war, with Putin's twitching index finger hovering over the red "launch 'em" button is not exactly the best course of action.

At this juncture in history, the last thing the world needs is for the Clown at 1600, masquerading as a world leader, to call for "regime change" – and for the three days it took for the White House handlers to try to walk back his "gaffe," that is exactly how the world interpreted his words – directed at the guy with nuclear weapons targeting the United States.

Obama's warning rings true today more than at any prior time: "Don't underestimate Joe's ability to #!*% things up."

With Putin's unprovoked, brutal and criminal invasion of Ukraine; with a united NATO to his west; with economic sanctions – ummm..., were they intended to deter? – taking a toll on his homeland; with his military generals being picked off "left and right" by Ukrainian snipers; with his armored columns being ripped apart by Javelin missiles – it makes absolutely no sense to further infuriate a madman. Memo #2 to the Goof: Putin ain't Corn Pop ..., and Corn Pop didn't have nukes.

They say that if ever a nuclear war were to break out, it would likely begin by mistake, where one side or the other "twitches" over "the button" at just the wrong moment. It will not matter if the twitch was a mistake or inadvertent: the warheads could be on their way.

The Goof is a mistake continually on the verge of happening every time he opens his mouth.., other, of course, than to yawn or ingest some ice cream. Candidly, he is proving that if anyone “cannot remain in power...,” it is he, the incompetent clown staring back in the mirror when he brushes his teeth in the morning..., assuming they aren’t kept in a glass of water on his nightstand when he retires for the night.

As warned here, he needs to resign or be impeached. Now. Because his next “gaffe” may be so serious – even if misunderstood – that no opportunity to “walk it back” at all will exist before Armageddon is under way.
